The first of the great principles of the American Revolution was the right of the people to be taxed only by their own representatives. This principle was first asserted in 1765, when the British Parliament passed the Stamp Act, which imposed a tax on all printed matter in the colonies. The colonists protested, and the British government repealed the act in 1766. But the colonists were not satisfied with the repeal, and they demanded that the British government should also repeal the Townshend Acts, which imposed a tax on imported goods.

The British government refused to do this, and the colonists decided to take more drastic action. In 1773, they organized the Boston Tea Party, in which they dumped a large quantity of tea into the harbor. This act of defiance led to the passage of the Coercive Acts by the British Parliament in 1774. These acts were designed to punish the colonists for the Boston Tea Party, and they included the closure of the port of Boston and the removal of the colonists' rights to trial by jury.

The colonists responded to the Coercive Acts by declaring that they were no longer bound by the laws of the British Parliament. They then elected a Continental Congress, which met in Philadelphia in 1776. This Congress was the first national government of the United States, and it was responsible for drafting the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution.

The Declaration of Independence was a statement of the colonists' grievances against the British government, and it was signed by the members of the Continental Congress on July 4, 1776. The Declaration declared that the colonies were no longer part of the British Empire, and that they were now free and independent states. The Declaration was a landmark document in the history of the United States, and it is one of the most important documents in the world.

The Constitution of the United States was drafted by the members of the Continental Congress in 1787. It was a document that established the framework for the government of the United States, and it has since been amended several times. The Constitution is the supreme law of the United States, and it is the foundation of the American system of government.

The second of the great principles of the American Revolution was the right of the people to be free from the oppression of the British government. This principle was first asserted in 1765, when the British Parliament passed the Stamp Act. The colonists protested, and the British government repealed the act in 1766. But the colonists were not satisfied with the repeal, and they demanded that the British government should also repeal the Townshend Acts, which imposed a tax on imported goods.
