reductions may have to be con- sidered. An official at another carrier expressed concern that a resumption of fare wars could force some troubled airlines out of business.

Whether Continental's lower fares will pose a threat may not be known for weeks. For now, say industry officials, Continental is not only fighting to counter traveler resistance because of the uncertainty about its future, but also a strike by many of its pilots.

Continental has been trying to overcome passenger concerns by $49 one-way fares to any non-stop destination, a fare that could allow a person to travel coast-to-coast with one change of flights for $98.

Most airline fares had stabi-
