

Reefs are normally relatively close to land, or at least in shallow marine waters. This is a common type of deposition and shows the relationship of various rock types that give us data to reconstruct the geological sequence of events.