CHAPTER I.

1630-1634.

THE first settlement of the English in New England was made in 1630, when a fleet of ships, under the command of John Winthrop, arrived at Boston. The settlers, who were Puritans, sought to establish a community based on their religious beliefs. They faced numerous challenges, including harsh weather and limited resources, but their determination led to the founding of the city.

The early years of the settlement were marked by hardship and struggle. The settlers had to build their homes and infrastructure from scratch, often in the face of severe weather conditions. Despite these difficulties, the community grew, and the settlers began to establish a sense of identity and purpose.

As the settlement grew, the settlers began to interact with the Native Americans, who had long inhabited the area. This interaction led to the exchange of goods and knowledge, but it also resulted in conflicts and misunderstandings. The settlers' desire for land and resources often clashed with the Native Americans' traditional way of life.

The city of Boston, founded in 1630, was the first of many English settlements in New England. It was a place of hope and challenge, where a group of Puritans sought to create a new society based on their religious principles.
