REPORT OF THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION

The American Medical Association has been very busy during the past year. It has held its annual meeting in December, 1918, at the Hotel Waldorf-Astoria, New York City. The meeting was attended by over 1,000 delegates from all over the United States and many foreign countries. The program was very full and interesting, and the delegates were able to discuss many important matters relating to the medical profession.

One of the most important matters discussed at the meeting was the question of the regulation of the medical profession. The delegates agreed that the medical profession should be regulated by a body of representatives of the public and the medical profession. This body should have the power to issue licenses to practice medicine, and to revoke licenses if necessary.

Another important matter discussed was the question of the payment of medical services. The delegates agreed that the payment of medical services should be based on the value of the service rendered. This means that the payment should be based on the skill and experience of the physician, and on the complexity of the case.

The delegates also discussed the question of the medical education of students. They agreed that the medical education of students should be based on a combination of theoretical and practical studies. This means that students should spend some time in the classroom, and some time in the hospital.

Finally, the delegates discussed the question of the medical profession's relationship to the public. They agreed that the medical profession should be open to the public, and that the public should be able to choose its own physician. This means that the medical profession should not be a closed shop, and that the public should have the right to choose its own physician.

The American Medical Association has been very successful in its efforts to improve the medical profession. It has been able to bring about many important reforms, and it has been able to improve the lives of many people. We hope that it will continue to do so in the future.
